

Faces of World War II

Aviation Fuel

Remembering back to February, this project ran flawlessly. We delegated the workload evenly, with no argument. Because of this, we were able to work diligently and efficiently.

I feel that this is “A” quality work. My favorite is the website that was designed by our awesome graphics designer Jade. I like how it maintains professionalism and it also visually appealing. I have no regrets for this project. I learned that depending on my group members, I didn't have to do all the work. I was used to doing most of the work on previous projects and this project was the first project this semester in which I didn't have to do most/all of the work.

If I were to compare this piece to a project from last year, I would compare it to the Projectile Launcher project. The Projectile Launcher project as that was a project in which we worked in a group to build a projectile launcher. During that project, we delegated the workload and took on a complex task—building a two-barreled projectile launcher. While we didn't go above and beyond on the Faces of World War II, we did delegate the work. This can also be compared to the “You be the Teacher”, in which I did all the work last semester. This shows that after my POL this year, I followed through on my goal of not working on the entire project myself; this is a good representation of change.
